Fantasy meets diversity

By TriciaAnn

Sterling is always in trouble. His parents are furious he's broken curfew - again. Something weird happened at school, and he was blamed for it. And there are strange lapses in time he can't explain. But things are going to get worse. Much worse. When Tetra begins popping in and out of his life, Sterling fears he's losing his mind. She claims to be from another world and says the two of them share a unique bond. If they are going to defeat their enemy, Sterling is going to have to accept the truth of who he is and learn to control the power inside him.

I loved this book so much, it's hard to know where to begin with this review. I'll start with Sterling because it was his unique voice that hooked me from the very beginning. He's such a fun character. He's clever, engaging, and easy to relate to. In addition to typical teen struggles (trying to fit in, not being as athletic as his friends, crushing on a hot girl who seems to have him in the friend zone), he's also dealing with a mentally ill parent. Sterling's point of view is often amusing and always authentic. His character is very well written.

Tetra is harder to relate to. She's from another world, so her tone is more formal. Her way of looking at the world and relating to others is the opposite of Sterling, so their alternating points of view really work in this story. As Tetra learns to adjust to the world she's in, she shows the vulnerability hidden behind her strength.

In terms of diversity, this book earns an easy five stars. It's refreshing to read a book where diversity is the norm and color of skin has nothing to do with race. Sexuality is dealt with in a matter of fact way, and gender roles are explored through Tetra's introspection.

The world-building in this book is among the best I've ever seen. It's a very well-written book I would highly recommend. I can't wait to read the next book in the series!

By Kate Diamond

Featured on All Our Worlds, my diverse SFF blog!

Before the strange girl showed up at his high school, Sterling Wayfairer only had mundane troubles to deal with: getting his grades up, dealing with his mother's mental illness, explaining his strict curfew to his friends.

Now, he now has a glowing hand, gaps in his memory, and a bizarre new roommate who can control water and read minds. Tetra tells him they're both from a world called Noba- and that they're spiritually bonded. Her mission: to take down a body-stealing monster.

Most of the troubles Tetra and Sterling deal with are typical high school issues: relationships, dating, friends, prom planning. Even though I'm not personally a big fan of mundane things like that, it was a lot of fun to see Tetra trying to fit into a culture that's so different from that of her home planet. It takes her a while to get things, such as the fact that a "boyfriend" isn't just a boy you know, and that you shouldn't talk about sex at the dinner table.

Gender roles are another thing that confuse Tetra. On Noba, gender doesn't really matter that much, so things like girls and boys being separated for gym puzzles her.

The issue of trust was very well done. Tetra can't just swoop into Sterling's life and recruit him, she has to earn his trust first. And manipulating his family into accepting her as an exchange student isn't the best way of doing that. Neither is keeping secrets.

There are even more problems on the horizon for the duo. The Naga is getting closer, and Sterling's visions of a fiery apocalypse are getting stronger.

The books leaves off on a cliffhanger. I'm really looking forward to the next books in the series, and especially to seeing Tetra's world.

Whoo boy, that ending is killer

By B R Sanders

Notes on Diversity

Given that the authors of The Mark of Noba are so deeply involved in the #WeNeedDiverseBooks movement, I set my expectations high in terms of diversity. I am happy to say they delivered!

The book starts with Sterling Wayfairer, who is a blond, blue-eyed cishet straight dude, but he is basically the only one of his kind in the book. And unlike in The Windup Girl, where this viewpoint dominates the narrative and makes the diversity surrounding the central White dude ornamental, Sterling Wayfairer is not put in a position of power or privilege in his world due to his Whiteness/cis-ness/het-ness. Virtually all of his friends are teens of color, and their presence is not especially noteworthy. Like with Niko, G L Tomas pushes back against White supremacy by creating a world where people of color are thoughtlessly acceptable, desirable, perfect just as they are. Racial tensions where Sterling lives seem not to exist, and this in itself is a strong pro-diversity statement 1.

AND THEN WE GET TETRA. Tetra is Black, like very dark Black, and she's beautiful and strong and smart and flawed (so flawed) but so redeemable. AND she is offhandedly queer, which made my heart flutter. (You can already tell I have a massive thing for Tetra, huh?). Tetra is a great character, and she is an especially great Black woman character. That she is so dark-skinned and consistently seen as desirable is another example of G L Thomas going the extra distance here in terms of visibility and diversity in their work.

But wait! There's more! With Sterling's mother we get a character grappling with mental disability, and with Sterling himself we see how that affects the people she loves. Laurel, Sterling's mother, was written with such nuance. As both the child of a parent with severe mental health issues and as a parent who struggles with mental health herself, the delicate and fraught relationship between Sterling and Laurel really got to me. That kind of relationship is very easy to write badly in fiction, and I've seen it written badly more than I've seen it written well--but G L Tomas got it right. They captured the layers of dependence and complication that the mental illness of a parent causes--the way it turns a child into a caretaker, and the way that muddies the relationship between the child and the parent.

Sterling Wayfairer is just trying to make the most of his senior year, but all he actually seems to do is get in trouble. And then things start to get weird: there's a girl at school in all his classes that only he seems to remember. He starts losing time. And then this girl, Tetra, moves into his house, convincing his parents that she's a 'foreign exchange student.' She says they know each other. She says they are bonded. She says their from some other world? And things get even weirder after that.

From Tetra's perspective, she's stumbled into a foreign world to get her bonded Traveler up to speed, but he remembers nothing. Literally nothing. And there's a monster loose, trying to find them to eat their souls. She has to protect this entire world, get Sterling up to speed, and protect him from the monster literally all by herself. While blending into at a local high school.

The book bounces back and forth between Sterling and Tetra's perspectives, giving us insight between how each of them is dealing with this enormously complicated situation. What's lovely about the back and forth is that both Sterling and Tetra have clearly defined and very, very different voices. Sterling is so young, and untempered, and so casual. Tetra, by comparison, is much more formal, and more wary, and starts off more focused on the task at hand. But, over the course of the book, she loosens up and relaxes into Sterling's space, his circle of friends, his family. Both of these characters grow a lot of the course of the book--Sterling matures, and Tetra seems to get younger and looser and warmer. I think we don't see Tetra's sort of reverse-arc enough, especially in YA books. It's especially meaningful to me because I feel like I've gone on a similar emotional journey as Tetra.

All the hallmarks of a YA high school book are here--midterms, prom prep, party hookup--but with the threat of a sci fi monster in the background. If there's one thing I would have changed about the book, it would have been a better balance between the high school foregrounding and the monster quest background arc. The hunt for the mysterious Naga hunting Sterling and Tetra slips in and out of the foreground to the extent that by the time the requisite showdown happens the stakes don't quite feel high enough. It's foreshadowed well at the beginning, but there's a lull in the middle of the book where the Naga seems to go into hibernation while Sterling and Tetra hang out and do high school things (which is great fun and excellent for their character development). Still, a better balance between both sides of the plot would have added tension all the way through the book and added even more emotional punch to an already gut-wrenching ending. Whoo boy, that ending is killer.

Even with the unevenness in the pacing and tension, this book is well worth the read. I am excited to see what Tomas does with the second book. The characterization is so strong, and the writing is lovely. The teaser chapter for the second book had me so intrigued!

Also, and this is a small but important point, the book design is beautiful. Just lovely to behold, from the cover to the chapter headings.

1For examples along other axes of this, see Malinda Lo's statements of writing fantasy worlds without homophobia.
